A number of investors have asked, "why is it when a well tests 7 MMcf/d, you put it on production, say at 3.5 MMcf/d". The reason is that the testing of a well is usually at close to atmosphere pressure, whereas, during production, there is a higher back pressure in the pipeline and process equipment. In addition, the test number is based on 32/64" choke size, whereas the well put on production with a smaller size, 20/64". The long-term production targets and parameters are taken into account to define the optimum flowrate. It should also be noted that the well head flowing pressure of each well should be adjusted in a way to allow the optimum flow from all the wells when there is more than one well flowing in to production pipeline. It is the producing pressures which are critical in defining the MMcf/d production.
